RESEARCH

Dissertation: Deciding Beyond Action

My dissertation argues that agency extends beyond intentional action to include controlled achievements. I distinguish deciding proper—the momentary formation of an intention—from the process of settling what to do, and challenge the view that deciding is a basic intentional action. I develop a positive account of deciding as a nonactional culmination of resolving practical uncertainty. The agent controls this culmination in virtue of an intention to resolve the uncertainty and the knowledge-how that connects the particular decision to this process-guiding intention. This non-actional account preserves responsibility-level control over decisions without regarding them as an anomalous kind of action that is never intended. I extend the account to creative ideation, explaining what grounds credit for originating ideas and how outsourcing their generation to AI changes that credit.
